Work Comes First

Layla had a talent for writing. She enjoyed writing because she could think of creative ideas and write them down on paper in a heartbeat. Her teachers often praised her work, saying she wrote as well as a poet. She typically achieved good grades on all of her tests and assignments. Layla had done so well in all of her writing classes that she now expected to get only perfect grades with minimal effort.

On the newest writing assignment, Layla was supposed to write a persuasive argument on a topic of her choice. She knew this assignment would be simple for her, so she decided she would write the paper the night before it was due. This gave her time to do fun things such as going on picnics, taking pictures of beautiful scenery, exercising, and listening quietly to the buzz of the bees around her.

The night before her assignment was due in class, Layla sat down to begin her persuasive argument paper on why everyone should exercise at least thirty minutes per day. She had not yet written a full paragraph when suddenly the lights went out in her town. The room was a black curtain, and Layla could not even see the paper in front of her. She descended the stairs to the kitchen when she heard her father enter the house.

Layla asked him if he knew the reason for the power outage. He said it was due to high winds. Because Layla had put off her writing assignment, she was unable to finish it that night. She was only able to earn partial credit on the assignment because she had failed to turn it in on time. Layla realized her persuasive writing assignment was more important than having fun, and she should have completed it before doing more enjoyable things. Layla decided that next time she would start her assignment earlier, even if writing came easily for her.
